Health and Safety
Executive

- Stress is defined by the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) as 'the adverse reaction people have to excessive pressures or other types of demand placed on them'
- Some people benefit from a certain amount of pressure as it can keep them motivated. However, when there is too much pressure, it can lead to stress
 - Stress affects people differently – what stresses one person may not affect another. Factors like skills and experience, age or disability may all affect whether a worker can cope.
 - Stress is not an illness, but it can affect a person's physical and mental health

Employers have a legal duty to protect workers from stress at work by doing a risk assessment and acting on it.

You should assess the risk of stress, and its impact on mental and physical ill-health, in the same way as you assess other work-related health and safety risks.

Workers feel stress when they can't cope with pressures and other issues. Employers should match demands to workers' skills and knowledge. For example, workers can get stressed if they feel they don't have the skills or time to meet tight deadlines. Providing planning, training and support can reduce pressure and bring stress levels down. There are six main areas of work design which can affect stress levels.

1. Demands
2. Control
3. Support
4. Relationships
5. Role
6. Change

Employers should assess the risks in these areas to manage stress in the workplace. How?...

Stress Risk Assessment for Individuals

Stress is an adverse reaction to excessive pressure or demands. Individual stress risk assessments (SRA) can be used to help identify and deal with work-related stress. The Trust recognises that a busy workplace often has demands and pressures which can be challenging. What is a source of stress for one person may not be a source of stress for another, and at different times individual employees may feel they are not able to cope with the pressures of work.

This is sometimes, but not always, exacerbated by pressures an individual may be experiencing outside of work. It is important that individuals raise any concerns about pressure at work and outside of work early, so that the organisation can look to see if steps can be taken to reduce excessive pressures (or stress) where possible and/or support the employee.

This risk assessment is based upon the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) Management Standards and can be used to support discussions with individual employees by systematically working through the pressures to consider if these are a source of stress and if they are, to consider what action can be taken to reduce the risks to performance and health.

Individual stress risk assessments are usually facilitated by the line manager.

Notes for Employees:

- Completing this SRA will help to identify and deal with work related stress. You are not obliged to complete it and share it with your manager, but we encourage you to do so because if they don't know what the problems are, they cannot help to resolve them.
- If you don't feel able to speak to your line manager about a work related concern, please speak to another manager, a colleague or HR for support.

Notes for Managers:

- You should invite your staff the opportunity to complete a SRA.
- When a member of staff tells you that they are suffering from work-related stress, especially if it results in sickness absence.
- If you suspect that an individual is suffering from work-related stress.
- You should not force staff to complete the questionnaire, it is their choice to do so, but explain that if you don't understand what the problems are you can't help deal with the issues.
- After the employee has returned the completed questionnaire (Part A), arrange to meet with them to discuss the issues raised and develop an action plan (using Part B) to address areas of concern.
- Remember to ensure the actions are completed in a timely manner and the action plan is reviewed periodically.
- Give a copy of the assessment form and action plan to the employee and retain a copy in personal file, for your reference.
- Please liaise with your Divisional HR Team if you need further support or advice.
